If Cora's website doesn't brighten your day and tantalize your taste buds, then perhaps her restaurant and inspiringly creative, colourful and healthy menu items will. The moment you walk into Chez Cora's (otherwise known as Cora's at some locations), the same images from her website carries onto the walls of the restaurant.

I love my breakfasts. I briefly heard about Cora's, but when a new construction began in my hometown of Bolton, Caledon, in Ontario, I was excited. I couldn't wait for it to open, so I searched the internet for other locations to rush off and discover it.

The minute I noticed they specialized in crepes, I couldn't believe my eyes. Bolton would now have a place to enjoy crepes. Then, it hit me again. Cora brought along another great favourite dish of mine. Creamy mounds of hollandaise sauce blanketing over poached eggs, hovering over strips of asparagus all resting on English muffins. "Glory days are here again", I blurted out with breaths of sighing relief; Eggs Benedict. Cora has a way with naming her dishes so I didn't expect any different from her with one of my favourite meals. I did not hesitate to place my order for "Eggs Ben et Dictine" and coffee, of course.

I don't know what totally astounded me more: the fact that one of my favourite dishes finally arrived in Bolton, or the way the fruit was delicately carved and presented. Either one, I couldn't wait to come back and try the other dishes.

The atmosphere was fun with lots to look at with the walls so artistically decorated with menu items. There was also something inspiring about the creative names given to each of the dishes.

There's quite a history attached to this popular dining establishment. You'll find Cora's story, from the startup in 1987 in a Montreal snack bar, leading up to the amazing growth of her empire today, on her website. As they say, "Try it, you'll like it!"

Oh, and look for this symbol:
